The Tasmanian Greens' conversion practices bill is an unnecessary piece of legislation that if passed would remove important rights of Tasmanians. It wrongly seeks to remove the rights of parents to parent their kids in the way they see fit, and undermines religious freedoms, which should not be dependent on the decisions of the Commissioner. The bill is too open to interpretation, and could lead to detransitioners being unable to access the support they request. This bill is completely unnecessary, and hides behind the false premise that cruel conversion practices are currently legal and being carried out in Tasmania. In reality, these practices are already covered by existing criminal laws. This bill hides behind a dangerous ideology, and must not become a law that shapes the state of Tasmania.
